

The tax implications of renting out a vacation home

Many Americans own a vacation home or aspire to purchase one. If you own a second home in a waterfront community, in the mountains or in a resort area, you may want to rent it out for part of the year.

The tax implications of these transactions can be complicated. It depends on how many days the home is rented and your level of personal use. Personal use includes vacation use by you, your family members (even if you charge them market rent) and use by nonrelatives if a market rent isn't charged.

Short-term rentals

If you rent the property out for less than 15 days during the year, it's not treated as "rental property" at all. In the right circumstances, this can produce revenue and significant tax benefits. Any rent you receive isn't included in your income for tax purposes. On the other hand, you can only deduct property taxes and mortgage interest — no other operating costs or depreciation. (Mortgage interest is deductible on your principal residence and one other home, subject to certain limits.)

If you rent the property out for more than 14 days, you must include the rent received in income. However, you can deduct part of your operating expenses and depreciation, subject to certain rules. First, you must allocate your expenses between the personal use days and the rental days. This includes maintenance, utilities, depreciation allowance, interest and taxes for the property. The personal use portion of taxes can be deducted separately. The personal use part of interest on a second home is also deductible (if eligible) when it exceeds the greater of 14 days or 10% of the rental days. However, depreciation on the personal use portion isn't allowed.

Losses may be deductible

If the rental income exceeds these allocable deductions, you report the rent and deductions to determine the amount of rental income to add to your other income. But if the expenses exceed the income, you may be able to claim a rental loss. This depends on how many days you use the house for personal purposes.

Here's the test: if you use it personally for more than the greater of 14 days or 10% of the rental days, you're using it "too much" and can't claim your loss. In this case, you can still use your deductions to wipe out rental income, but you can't create a loss. Deductions you can't claim are carried forward and may be usable in future years. If you're limited to using deductions only up to the rental income amount, you must use the deductions allocated to the rental portion in this order:

- Interest and taxes,
- Operating costs, and
- Depreciation.

If you "pass" the personal use test, you must still allocate your expenses between the personal and rental portions. However, in this case, if your rental deductions exceed your rental income, you can claim the loss. (The loss is "passive," however, and may be limited under passive loss rules.)

Navigate a plan

These are only the basic rules. There may be other rules if you're considered a small landlord or real estate professional. Contact us if you have questions. We can help plan your vacation home use to achieve optimal tax results